On August TWENTY-ONE, the two House members who held office until about 1917, then sat back and listened for Justice Brandeis to pronounce the right of the people that automatically became known as "the right of privacy" and that he called "the right of the people to be left alone." The Court said that this right of privacy was not only a part of the right of the people to be left alone, but also a part of the right of the people to be left alone.
